

Linkedin Training

- No resume alone is going to get you a job. A successful job hunt is equal parts of five things—exploration, research, positioning, networking, and job hunt
 - You have to explore the industry/role you specifically want, research the company you want, position yourself accordingly, network to get an inside referral, and then submit your resume.
 - Recruiters love referrals because data shows that referred candidates get hired faster and stay longer
- The average recruiter is juggling 30-40 open roles and the average job listing attracts 250 resumes. The best recruiters used LinkedIn, and they search by job title

Exploration

- Alumni tool
 - Navigating: Search school name in search bar > Click on school > Click on “Alumni” tab on home page
 - Filtering: Search alumni by desired function (e.g. “product manager”, be sure to use quotes). You can continue to filter by company
 - Connecting: If you find someone with whom you want to connect and message, without using premium, select “Connect” button > Add personalized message
- LinkedIn cold outreach message guidelines (Commonality, Curiosity, and Call-to-Action)
 - Sentence #1: Prove you’re not a stranger, state what you have in common: “I’m a current/alumni of (school), and I was thrilled to come across your profile.”
 - Sentence #2: State what you are looking for—learning, a referral, a job, etc: “I’m torn between a PM and consulting career path and would love to learn from your expertise.”
 - Sentence #3: Take all the friction out of the process: “Any chance you have 10 minutes for a quick Zoom chat?”

Positioning

- LinkedIn recruiter gives people access to half a billion professionals globally. The tool is most geared towards 1) number of instances of key words (e.g. “brand marketing,” “product marketing,” etc.) 2) closeness of connection, and 3) photo
- Most important key word is the job title itself; most important placement: 1) Headline 2) Summary/About 3) Experience
 - The algorithm places a high value on words in these three categories because they are the sections with the smallest character limit, placing greater value on the words within them
 - Headline: “Aspiring Product Manager” or “Seeking Product Manager Roles”

- About: Include one line about what you are (e.g. “Experienced marketer with a track record of successful X: (list bullet points proving it)”) and include one line about what you want “Looking for a product manager? Contact me at (email)”
 - Experience: Include resume points beneath each job
 - Skills: Add and max out
- To identify key words needed, look at dream job postings and see what key words they use. This is what the recruiter and algorithm is using
 - Use Jobscan and paste a copy of your profile versus a couple of your ideal job postings. This will give what % of the key words in the job description are reflected on your LinkedIn profile and which ones to add
- Photo: Smiling and attire should match desired corporate culture (startup as casual, finance as formal, etc)
- Endorsements don’t show up on LinkedIn recruiter. Recommendations appear in full on LinkedIn recruiter. Go for quality over quantity (managers and clients, not subordinates) and ask them to include keywords
- If you want example profiles that worked, search “[School name] [Desired job title]” in the search bar, and find people’s profile who are in the position you want to be in. Emulate what they have done
- Cover photo: Go to Pexels and search for royalty-free images
- Follow the companies where you want to work

Job Hunt

- If you have a job you really want, see who posted the role, and connect with that recruiter. If you don’t get it, you can always follow-up with the recruiter after the fact
- Create alerts for jobs that meet desired criteria. The alert will only show you the new jobs posted that meet your criteria, not all thousands of roles
 - Navigation: Search for jobs > Click “create alert” > Set frequency
 - You can also set an alert for one company at a time, to show you what kinds of new jobs they are posting, where are they growing and see the biggest need
- Toggle “Open to opportunities” button to be seen by recruiters. This can be a first filter for the recruiter to test whether their applicant pool will respond
 - It is by default turned off that your current company can see whether or not you turn it on
- When searching for roles via the search bar, use the filters to narrow down thousands of results
 - Time frame: Start by filtering those that were posted in the past week
 - Experience level: Include “safety” and “stretch” seniority
 - Company: Filter by desired size
 - On-side/remote, full-time/part-time, etc.
- When you find a posting you like, click on it (every posting is hyperlinked) to see the full posting > Scroll down > See “Similar jobs” section. This can help broaden list of potential employers
- To automatically share your profile with a recruiter, go to Settings > Data Privacy > Job Seeking Preferences > “Share your profile when you click Apply for a job” > On

- To signal to a particular company that you want to work for them, and that you're interested in them specifically, go to Settings > Data Privacy > Job Seeking Preferences > Share job alerts and signal interest to recruiters > "On"

Network

- Second degree connections
 - Search "[Name of company] [Role]" in search bar and look for those that have a shared connection (2nd degree connection) > Select 2nd degree connection > Click name of mutual connection > Send message to mutual connection
 - For example, if you want to reach out to John Doe on Google's Product Marketing team, and you have a mutual connection Jane, reach out to Jane via messaging with the following
 - "Hi Jane, Would you mind introducing me to John? I'm thinking about applying for jobs in his field but want to make sure it is a good fit. If you're willing to do so, I've included a message below that you can just forward over

<<<Message to Forward>>>

Hi John,

I recently came across your profile on LinkedIn and was so fascinated by all the awesome things you've done. In particular, I'd love to learn about your experience with product marketing, as I'm considering that field myself.

That said, I know you must be incredibly busy right now. But if you have even 10 minutes to chat in the next few weeks, just let me know as I'd love to learn from your expertise!

Thanks for considering!

- Alumni connections
 - Search "[Name of company] [Role]" in search bar > All filters tab in upper righthand corner > Click "Add School" under the school section and type in your college > Click show results > Select a person to whom you can connect and "Add note" to connection request
 - If you reach your personalized note limits, here is workaround
 - Example outreach message "I came across your profile and, as a fellow [College] grad. I'd be thrilled to learn about your experience with [Role.] Any chance you have 10 minutes to chat next week? I'd love to get your advice!"
- Networking question ideas
 - It's great to connect with you via [Name] - thanks for making the time!

- I'd love to learn about your experience at [Company]. What led you to work there?
- What's kept you there over time?
- What's it like on the inside - and specifically as a [role]?

Research

- Read through a company's page. Use their same language in your interview and/or resume
- To find big voices by function or company, search key words in the search bar > Select "Posts" and LinkedIn will show the posts where the keyword appears that are the most popular. This can highlight big names, or at least well-followed, in the space
 - Follow a few of the "LinkedIn influencers" to see what is happening in the industry and learn the language
- Follow the same process for groups as you do for big voices
 - You can join groups on function or role and message people within that group who share similar characteristics (school, etc)
- To anticipate potential interview questions, click the Job icon > Interview prep to see common practice questions
 - Click "Categories" to narrow down further
- Most unfiltered feedback will come from people who used to work at the company
 - All People > Advanced search > Past company [Name of company]
 - Example message: "Just saw that you used to work at [Company] and was quite intrigued. Especially since I'm considering an offer there right now. Might you have 15 minutes to chat this week about your experience?"
 - Ask them these two essential questions:
 - Why did you leave?
 - Would you ever work there again?
- The most useful data point in salary negotiations is how much the competition is paying
